		Researchers in China have discovered that Al models like ChatGPT process information in a similar way to the human brain.  A shudy into large language models (LLMs) found evidence that popular artificial intelligence tools built by OpenAl and Google sort information in a spontaneous way, despite not being trained to do so.
		The findings, made by a team from the Chinese Academy of Sciences and South China University of Technology, revealed that LLMs "share fundamental similarities that reflect key aspects of human conceptual knowledge" - challenging the assumption that AI systems simply mimic responses through pattern recognition.
